WARNING RISK (required)

In order to meet international standards, the Council wishes to inform Pulse Capital Investments warning about the risks of complex products.

CFD

A CFD (Contract for Difference) is speculation about changes in values. The product allows to speculate on future increases or decreases in the value of a specific asset; eg action. If your speculations prove to be correct, you will get a profit from the difference in value (less costs), but you will pay the difference in value (plus costs) if your speculations turn out to be wrong. Being tied to an underlying asset, the value of a CFD depends on that asset.

CFDs are always margin trades. CFDs are typically negotiated with counterparty, but some CFDs are traded on a regulated market. However, the price always fluctuates with the price of the underlying product, which in most cases usually traded on an organized market. The price and liquidity of CFDs on individual stocks reflect the price and liquidity of the stock market on which such action is admitted for trading.

Because CFDs are subject to operating margin, allowing you to take a higher position than they could afford only the funds you have deposited a relatively small negative or positive movement in the underlying instrument can have a significant effect on your investment. Therefore, CFD trading involves a relatively high risk. This makes the potential gain is quite high, even if the tank is small. If your total exposure on margin trades exceeds your deposit, you risk losing more money than they deposited.
